This international journal of educational studies presents up-to-date information with analyses of significant problems and trends throughout the world. It especially considers the implications of comparative studies for the formation and implementation of policies—not only in educational but in social, national and international development. Thus it welcomes contributions from associated disciplines in the fields of government, management, sociology—and indeed technology and communications—as these affect educational policy decisions.

Articles submitted to the Editorial Board are assessed by all members and are discussed in detail at Board meetings three times a year—an unusual, if not unique, feature. In addition, expert advice is taken on particular papers.

Over 36 years Comparative Education's editorial policy and presentation have evolved to match world developments and the changing concerns of those active in education or involved in its finance, management and wider implications. Our readership has evolved too in proportion as comparative studies of education have attracted the attention of statesmen, the commercial/industrial world, and parents and voters.
